What is one's "comfort zone"? It refers to our habits or the things we are comfortable doing. When we follow a routine, like going to work every day, we are in our comfort zones.

When we do something new and risky, then we are stepping out of our comfort zones.

Usually, those with strong determination to achieve are good at breaking routines. They are willing to try new things, to take action, and then to see what happens. Of course, this also means being willing to experience failure. For this reason, breaking routines often takes courage. Most of us prefer things that are familiar and constant as these make us feel safe. However, a person who never steps out of his or her comfort zone may become bored or too relaxed. The person may also miss the chance to learn new things or discover new talents.

To grow in new directions, stepping out of the comfort zone is necessary. Try to challenge yourself by taking some small steps. For example, if you are afraid of public speaking, you might start with speaking in front of a small group of friends. Next, try speaking to a small group of strangers. Then, speak to a larger group. Small steps add up, and soon you'll be able to leave your comfort zone and achieve a higher level of skill.
