III. Reading Comprehension: (10%)

Entering college is an exciting time in young people's lives. But being away from home and parental oversight for the first time brings with it many challenges.

To begin with, just saying goodbye to friends and loved ones can be emotionally painful. Once on campus, it is common for students to feel homesick even as they are forced to adjust to increased freedoms and responsibilities. Parents are no longer readily available to provide support and guidance with important decisions. Even basic tasks, such as managing study time, budgeting money, maintaining personal hygiene, and establishing daily routines, must be done independently. College students must make new friends as the family relationships become more distant. Romantic involvements can be complicated under any circumstances, but when added to the new demands of independent college life, they can be especially difficult to handle.

Naturally, all of these new responsibilities and decisions can lead to feelings of pressure and anxiety. Dealing with these feelings begins with simple things like eating healthy foods and getting enough sleep. It is also important to create a social network in dorms and campus organizations, and to seek help from professors and other institutions within the school if life becomes too stressful.

There is no doubt that college life brings with it special challenges. But with knowledge and preparation, college life can be fun, productive, and successful.
