Tuesdays With Morrie

tuesdays with Morrie, written by the American writer Mitch Albom, tells the true story of a teacher-student relationship. Morrie Schwartz was Mitch Albom's favorite professor when Albom was a college student in the late 1970s. Then, the two men lost touch. Two decades later, Albom visited his old teacher again. By then, Schwartz was dying.

For weeks, the two men met on Tuesdays to discuss the art of living. "Dying is one thing to be sad about," Schwartz told Albom, "but living unhappily is another thing." He advised the younger man to reject popular culture, with its emphasis on appearances and material goods. Instead, he urged a life based on moral choices—and on love. "The most important thing in life is to learn how to give out love, and to let it come in," Schwartz said.

And Schwartz did just that. Although he was dying, he did not want pity. He preferred to see friends and to try to do good. "I decided I'm going to live, or at least try to live, the way I want—with dignity, with courage, with humor, with composure," he told Albom.

How did he do that?
