In many countries, it is common for people to donate (捐贈) second-hand clothes to charities (慈善機構). People carefully check and clean the clothes they no longer wear and then put them in the clothes collection boxes at the roadside. Volunteers from the charities drive around in trucks and pick up the clothes. The charities usually give the clothes to people who need them. Sometimes, they sell the clothes for money and then help people in other ways.

In recent years, however, the charities have been faced with a big problem. Since most of the given clothes are of good quality (品質), some dishonest businessmen take the clothes away and sell them in their second-hand clothing stores. They even place some fake collection boxes which look almost the same as the ones placed by the charities. This makes it difficult for the charities to collect used clothes. People who are in need thus have harder lives.

To stop this from happening, people can bring the used clothes to charities' own collection centers. At the same time, the charities can ask the police to help take away the fake collection boxes. This way, the gift of love can really go to charity.
